To all whom it may Concern.

WE doubt not, but envy and ill-will may induce many to raise objections to different articles in the foregoing pages ; notwithstanding the pains which have been taken, both by masters and men, to settle every article on the most just and equitable terms, as far as the present state of affairs would admit of.

To such we would make no reply ! To the impartial objecter we would observe.

We know there are some of that unhappy cast, that they are never contented long with any thing, as it would be labour lost to try to please such, so we hope their number are but small. Upon the whole we are enabled to say, (which with the utmost gratitude we would acknowledge) we have found much more merit amongst our masters, then we at first expected. We hope such as have distinguished themselves in this way, will find their account in it.

What may appear disagreeable to one, may appear more favourable to another. This one thing we dare affirm ; we have laboured as much to avoid giving any just cause of offence, as any others possibly could in our circumstances ; if we have not succeeded as well, it will we hope appear not so much our fault, as misfortune. If there should appear any real faults faults to unprejudiced minds, let such please to reflect, that there never was a work of this, or any other kind, that did not discover some imperfection. With respect to the objections that some may make to the persons who undertook this difficult task, as wanting such and such requisite qualifications, as they supposed needful.—Let it be remembered, what a critical situation our affairs were then in ; and how difficult, nay impossible, to find any persons, except they who did undertake it, that had the public peace so much at heart, as to inspire them with resolution, sufficient to enter on so arduous an employ. However, we have, we think, taken the most effectual method to preserve ourselves from censure, by carefully avoiding to do any thing of ourselves ; but on the settling of every article in debate, have taken pains to procure a sufficient number of the most able and approved workmen, the different branches in debate afforded. Nay, we have at all times not only admitted, but even requested the attendance of all who had any connections with the business. And as we are certain the Journeymen that did attend, will not find fault, so are we certain, such as would not attend, have of all the world the least right to find fault. Again, let it be remembered, that at our first setting out, we did not propose to make advancements, only to establish what we had, which, by the assistance of many worthy masters. it is presumed we have.

WHEN

WHEN base oppression wav'd it's iron rod,
 And under foot an helpless people trod,
 Distressed families felt the direful smart,
 Keen anguish pierc'd the honest labourer's heart,
 Provisions high, and wages vastly low,
 Starving at home, not knowing where to go ;
 In this delemma, think what could they do,
 What method take, what course must they pursue
 Made by oppression, mad their minds distracted,
 Shut up from all relief, such parts were acted ;
 By some who void of sense, were void of fear,
 Oh ! may such dreadful scenes no more appear,
 What greatful sentiments must fill our hearts ;
 When we reflect on those who took our parts ;
 Who touch'd by tender feelings of compassion,
 Were mov'd by justice only, not by passion ;
 May bounteous providence their labours bless,
 Who help'd to crown our labours with success,
 And may no treacherous, base, designing men,
 E'er make encroachments on our rights again ;
 May upright masters still augment their treasure,
 And journeymen pursue their work with pleasure,
 May arts and manufactories still increase,
 And Spitalfields be blest with prosperous peace.

WHEN pale oppression wove its iron rod,
And under foot an helpless people trod,
Distressed families felt the cruel smart,
Keen anguish pierce'd the honest labourer's heart,
Provisions high, and wages vastly low,
Starving at home, not knowing where to go;
In this dilemma, think what could they do,
What method take, what course must they pursue
Made by oppression, made their minds distracted,
Shrunk from all relief, their parts were acted;

And our fields be bless'd with profuse produce.
